SWEDEN

- The constitution of Finland guarantees the right to have any charges brought against oneself handled without undue delay by a court of law or other authority, as well as other aspects of a fair trial. In the past few years, the European Court of Human Rights has ruled in individual cases that indicted persons in Finland have been subjected to excessively lengthy trial proceedings and other violations of article 6 of the European Convention on Human Rights on the right to a fair trial in its various aspects. Similar criticism has been directed at Sweden. What measures is the government of Finland taking to ensure that legal proceedings conform to its obligations with regard to the right to a fair trial in accordance with international standards?
- The Council of Europe Committee of Ministers, the European Commission against Racism and Intolerance and the Finnish Ombudsman for Minorities have reported shortcoming in the enjoyment of human rights by members of the Roma minority, including social discrimination as well as access to housing and social services. Could the government of Finland elaborate on its efforts to ensure the full enjoyment of their human rights for Roma persons?

DENMARK

- Finnish legislation on civilian service has been debated in Finland and internationally. The choice of civilian service should not in any way imply any penal aspects. Is the length of civilian service in Finland identical to the length of military service? To what extent is there a possibility for exemption on religious or conscientious grounds? Does the possibility of civilian service apply in time of war as well as in peace?
